Folk We Touch in Passing

TEMPERAMENTALLY UNQUALIFIED?

"What becomes of the hundreds of women who go out in the world to compete with men?" questioned The Busy Man of The Little Lady. "Why do comparatively so few attain any permanent place, or win any worth-while success in business?" he demanded to know. And before The Little Lady could reply he answered his own questions.

(Copyright, 1916.)

"It would be an absurdity to deny dead set on a career. She came down to me for a job and her very enthusiasm won me."

"The grasped knowledge of the business with astounding rapidity, and I was making up my mind that she was going to prove an exception to the rule when the obstruction made itself apparent."

"Every time a man came into my office Sue attracted his attention; drew him to her like a magnet. I studied the thing out, but could never find just what she did nor how she did it."

"I would be talking earnestly on a matter of business to some chap who was a stranger to her, when I would be quietly shaken out of my forgetfulness of Sue by a calm question about some dictation she had taken, or something else equally as inconsequential, and that might just as well have waited until my caller had gone."

"The very gentleness of her; her sweetly smiled question distracted my visitor, and won for Sue the attention that seemed to her as essential as the air she breathed."

"I'll wager that not one man in a dozen who came into my office on business ever left it without a memory of my secretary, and yet I could not accuse the girl of insinuating or ill-breeding."

"And I am just as sure that Sue Belmont could describe accurately every man who called upon me during the month that I employed her."

"Month!" ejaculated The Little Lady.

"What else?" asked The Busy Man. "A fellow can't employ a girl who distracts the attention of every man who comes to see him on business unless they get quite off the track of the purpose of their visit."

"And," added The Busy Man with a sigh, "that's just one little experience out of many. I'll tell you that it is always some peculiarly feminine quality that obstructs the way of the average woman to climbing the business heights."

"Shall I tell you why?" he went on without pausing for The Little Lady to make answer to his volley of questions. "It's because women are temperamentally unqualified for a business life, or any appreciable business success. God meant the majority of them to be homemakers and mothers. That is their real business in the world although many of them shrink it. Meaning these things for the woman as I know. Her mother wanted her to stay at home and help make life lovely there, but Sue was

"You remember Sue Belmont?" asked The Busy Man with apparent irrelevance. "Well, she is about as intelligent a young woman as I know. Her mother wanted her to stay at home and help make life lovely there, but Sue was
